As the January Blackwood predicted, the result of the English elections has been adverse to the Gladstone ministry and the liberals. So far four hundred to the new parliament, of which two hundred and twenty-seven are conservatives, and one hundred and ninetythree liberals. There are still two hundred and thirty-eight members to elect, but the leading presses claim that the Four Bollars a Day and Five Cents a result will make no appreciable difference. The conservatives will be victorious, and will, there is little doubt, have a clear, working majority. The extent of this defeat can be appreclated by our readers when we remind liberals had a majority of one hundred and twelve, by which they were enabled to secure compulsory education, the disestablishment of the Irish church, free ballot, the abolition of commissions by purchase in the army, and other reforms that, to those who know anything of the conservative temperand tendency of the English mind, appear little short of wonders, so extremely radical and sweeping are they. Disraeli will now replace Gladstone, and we shall, upon the assembling of the new parliament, witness the introduction of perhaps still more radical measures, paving the way for the resumption of power by the liberals. We hope so.

THE proceedings of the general council last night, elsewhere reported, are without special interest. The resolution from the aldermen, tendering Market square to the county as a suitable site for a courthouse, was laid on the table by the councilmen, much to the disgust of most of those present, and no doubt to all who read of it to-day. We hope the resolution will be revived and
